Dear Whatnot hiring team,

I buy Pokémon cards on Whatnot. I follow a few of my favourite TCG creators on there, and I've watched a good break turn an idle scroll into a purchase before I'd finished my coffee. So the Category Marketing Manager role didn't read like the usual job alert. It's a product I use, in a category I care about.

More usefully, I already do a version of this job. At Derivia Intelligence I own buyer acquisition for SRP end to end, from strategy and brand through to the revenue number. Last year that was £1.1m in new business and 70% of all new revenue for the brand. Swap hedge funds for card collectors and it's the same job you're hiring for: grow demand for a category and turn it into sales.

A few things from your brief that I've already done:

- Campaigns and events from a blank page. I led a global industry survey, built it into a content campaign, and it drove 3 closed deals and 400+ downloads. I also ran the go-to-market for a new product aimed at a sceptical, technical audience.
- Measurement I act on. I built an automated weekly report that pulls our web and BI data, shows where demand is coming from and how warm it is, then hands me 3 to 5 things to do that week. Engagement numbers that don't move pipeline don't interest me.
- Creators from the buyer's side. I know what makes me trust a creator and hit buy, because I'm the person on the other end of the stream. Most marketers have to imagine that moment. I've lived it.

I'm also the go-to for AI across my company. I've built the reporting and content workflows and run the workshops, including a business case I took to our CEO and CFO. For a team moving at startup pace, that means more output without more headcount.

Why this, why now: I want to do this work at consumer speed, in the creator economy, for a platform I'd open on a Friday night anyway.

I'm London-based and would love to talk.
